

Intelligence Shifts Eyed By President

President Kennedy is studying several proposals for changes in Government intelligence operations, White House Secretary Pierre Salinger indicated late yesterday.

Mr. Salinger denied a published report that the President is completing plans to give a new official without ties to any operational agency the function of evaluating all intelligence information.

Such a move would in effect downgrade the Central Intelligence Agency, which has come under some criticism for its role in the invasion of Cuba.

Mr. Salinger pointed out that a number of wide-ranging studies into Government intelligence agencies have been made and said that a number of proposals for changes have been made.

But no decision has been reached regarding any move to strip the CIA of its intelligence evaluation function, he emphasized.

Allen W. Dulles, CIA director, is expected to retire late this year in accordance with arrangements he made with the President when he was re-appointed last November. Fowler Hamilton, New York lawyer, has been widely mentioned as a possible successor to Mr. Dulles or as a special intelligence adviser to the President.

AUG 4 1961

WASHINGTON STAR

Approved For Release 1999/09/16 : CIA-RDP70-00058R00020

STATINTL

Intelligence Shifts Eyed By President

President Kennedy is studying several proposals for changes in Government intelligence operations, White House Secretary Pierre Salinger indicated late yesterday.

Mr. Salinger denied a published report that the President is completing plans to give a new official without ties to any operational agency the function of evaluating all intelligence information.

Such a move would in effect downgrade the Central Intelligence Agency, which has come under some criticism for its role in the invasion of Cuba.

Mr. Salinger pointed out that a number of wide-ranging studies into Government intelligence agencies have been made and said that a number of proposals for changes have been made.

But no decision has been reached regarding any move to strip the CIA of its intelligence evaluation function, he emphasized.

Allen W. Dulles, CIA director, is expected to retire late this year in accordance with arrangements he made with the President when he was reappointed last November. Fowler Hamilton, New York lawyer, has been widely mentioned as a possible successor to Mr. Dulles or as a special intelligence adviser to the President.